Reason For Selection	This was the first consumer-level digital camera, with a color LCD monitor, and a resolution of 250,000 pixels. It cost just ¥65,000, an incredibly low price at the time, which was achieved by stripping back functionality to the bare minimum and reusing existing components. As the first truly portable and inexpensive camera which supported instant reviewing of photos, it quickly became a runaway success, almost single-handedly launching the digital revolution while at the same time making a powerful statement of Japan's status as a technological leader on the global stage. Today it stands as an important symbol of how the transition from film to digital fundamentally transformed the way we use cameras.
